MR. GLADSTONE ON THE SPANISH
PEACE, 6th May.

The Society of Political Economy recently sent to Mr. Gladstone an address expressing its deep regret that he had retired from public life. In his letter of thanks, addressed to Mr. Leon Say, Mr. Gladstone says: "It is a severe affliction to see the economic good, lost in the last 30 years, not only in the United States, but in the rest of the Anglo-Saxon race, and the mere material loss, but regret the change still more because free trade development in the nation goodwill. Great Britain remains today the solitary adherent of what formerly was regarded as the established economy. Neverless, it is, when experience and reason will exert the minds of the undeliberate to the same, front faith."

THE GREATEST TRADE MONOPOLY.

LONDON, 5th May.

The Daily News has acquired among leading representatives of the oil trade in England a report of a secret agreement between the Standard Oil Company and the London Oil companies. "Our inquiries do not confirm the reports of such an agreement," it says, "and the latter are obviously premature. It is an open secret, however, that the negotiations have been in progress some time, and there is little doubt that the results will be the greatest trade monopoly that the world has ever seen."

THE IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

LONDON, 10th May.

The debate on the Budget Bill in the House of Commons this evening was begun before a well filled house. As it continued signs of intense interest in the coming division became evident in the sides. The House seats 1,000,000, the lobbies were packed. The discussion of the Budget was gathering impetus. The heavyontario artiller was brought out by the Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, leader of the Unionists. Whether good or bad, the Budget was really incisive with the traditions of Liberal finance. It was not a national, but a class Budget. In it the Government avoided the responsibility of the private others. The split amicably with the owners and publicans on the following assumption that excessive profits justified taxation. The graduated income tax might be good in principle but the method of application proposed by the Government directly increased trade and individual interests. The new duties milted into the pockets of the rich, while the poor, who had to pay the same amount, the small sporting assets to become portions of the largest aggregate owned possibly by some American millionaire, but the exhaustive drifts upon the greater properties under the Estates duties would in no wise bring nearer by a single day the millennium which the Government pretended to have in view. Mr. Balfour said that the proposed scheme had no merit of the scheme the greatest of all, which was the absurd pretension of the author that he had done away with the existing anomalies of taxation.

Sir William Harcourt, Chancellor of the Exchequer, defended his Budget. In his motion to reject the Bill, he said, representing the poor and the middle classes, he had contended that base and spurious incomes could not bear the additional taxation. Would they then favour taxing sugar, sugar, or income?

In referring to Mr. Balfour's structure upon the new Estate duties and the Income Tax, Sir William Harcourt quoted the recommendations of John Smart Mill and others, and said, in part of grade, in the Committee, since he had in mind in a generation a just economic system. These lay the fundamental principle that must survive, for it was the principle of justice. He challenged the vote of the House on this principle and he was prepared to do what he could, to ask the country's verdict (applause).

When Sir William's speech was over, the House was in a dead silence. The Speaker read those flares to the house the supports of the Government burst into ringing cheers. The Unionists replied with equal vigor, and nearly two minutes were spent in a general shout. In the division all the Parades and Mr. William Sanderson, Radical for the Walthamstow, Merton, and Newington, joined the Unionists. Messrs. Mark Hanley, Sydney Everard, and William McEwan, all Liberals, abstained from voting. Mr. Robert Throssell Reid, who had stood again after his return to the Solent, Generalship, was called in by the Speaker to represent Dumfries, but was unable to take his seat in time to vote.
